

Contents

List of illustrations	page	viii
Preface		ix
Acknowledgments		xi
Note on manuscript citations		xii
Introduction: Darwin and his fellow naturalists		1
1 Darwin and the biology of the 1830s: some parallels		6
2 Darwin before Malthus		39
3 Natural selection and perfect adaptation, 1838–1844		60
4 Part II of Darwin's work on species		87
5 Natural history after Cuvier: the branching conception of nature		115
6 Darwin and the branching conception		146
7 Classification and the principle of divergence		170
8 The principle of divergence and the transformation of Darwin's theory		191
9 Natural selection and "natural improvement"		210
Conclusion: The development of Darwin's theory as a social process		229
Notes		236
Bibliography		278
Index		291

My greatest intellectual debts are to Camille Limoges and

Illustrations

Charles Darwin	frontispiece
Karl Ernst von Baer	page 118
Von Baer's representation of the typical vertebrate embryo (cross section)	120
Henri Milne Edwards	127
Richard Owen	131
Owen's representation of the vertebrate archetype	134
Owen's illustrations of specialization in the ancestry of the horse, originally used in his paleontological lectures at the Royal School of Mines, 1857	139
Milne Edwards's embryological classification of vertebrates	161
Two Darwin notes. Top: November 1854, the problem posed by classification. Bottom: September 1856, a key part of Darwin's solution – the principle of divergence	182